Advances in DERMATOLOGY

THURSDAY - FRIDAY
JUNE 7-8, 2012
New York, NY

Sponsored by the NYU Post-Graduate Medical School

129 Years of Continuing Medical Education
THE RONALD O. PERELMAN
DEPARTMENT OF DERMATOLOGY
New York University School of Medicine
Target Audience
This activity has been designated for practitioners who care for people with skin disease, including dermatologists, dermatologic surgeons, and dermatology residents.

Course Description
Dermatology is a rapidly changing specialty, with novel advances in medical, surgical, and procedural/cosmetic dermatology made yearly. In addition, it is a specialty that frequently uses treatments off-label for diseases that have no approved drug. Thus, it is a field that is fertile ground for new drug development, as well as discovering new ways of using older approved drugs. This two-day program will provide practitioners who care for people with skin disease, including dermatologists, dermatologic surgeons, and residents in dermatology, with a therapeutic update based on the real-life experiences of the faculty. It will address the best approaches to better health-related outcomes for both well-recognized and newly described disease states/dermatologic conditions.

Statement of Need
Newer interventions have been introduced that promise, and often deliver, better outcomes with fewer adverse side effects. However, because of the emergence of sub-specialization in dermatology, data on new interventions are not necessarily communicated uniformly, and thus not incorporated in a timely fashion to community dermatologists. Advances in laser technologies and light sources, as well as filler substances, including new biostimulatory treatments, have served to improve the practice of cosmetic dermatology. These advances frequently offer improved outcomes for patients who elect to visit a dermatologic practitioner who specializes in cosmetic dermatology, but again, clinicians need to be aware of the data available on outcomes in order to incorporate these options into practice and counsel patients about the benefits and risks of treatment options. The treatment of skin cancer is always being updated, with newer recommendations deriving from epidemiologic, histopathologic, and clinical research. In non-melanoma cancers, new interventions can decrease the risk of developing new skin cancers. Significantly, since the last program, the FDA has approved two new therapies for metastatic melanoma. Through these approaches, as well as the efficient extirpation of existing skin cancers before they cause local destruction or spread, patient morbidity and mortality can be decreased.

Educational Objectives

- Discuss treatment options, including off-label usage of available drugs for dermatologic diseases and strategies for incorporating their use in practice.
- Critically evaluate efficacy and safety profiles for systemic/biologic medications and modalities for treating debilitating skin diseases such as psoriasis, pyoderma gangrenosum, hidradenitis suppurativa, severe acne vulgaris, and atopic dermatitis, as newer small molecule and biologic medications for skin disease are introduced.
- Utilize a tailored approach for selecting therapies for patients by assessing a number of factors, including age, gender and psychological profile, to ensure minimal risk.
- Demonstrate confidence in addressing complicated medical and surgical dermatologic problems, based on an increased awareness of available data relevant to both older and novel therapeutic modalities.
- Update skin cancer approaches based on new recommendations for the prevention of new cancers through prophylactic approaches and the efficient extirpation of existing skin cancers before either local destruction or metastatic spread affects patient morbidity and mortality.
- Take into account available data on outcomes, evaluate new technologies in laser and light sources as well as fillers and injectables in cosmetic dermatology.
